About the theme

The Indian society is highly stratified and hierarchical in character. This involves institutional processes that economically and socially exclude, isolate and deprive some groups on the basis of caste, ethnicity or religious background. These groups include lower castes generally identified as dalits, tribals and religious minority groups; who together account for about one fourth of India's population. They are deprived of adequate access to basic needs of life such as health, education, housing, food, security, employment, justice and equity. In addition, they lack sustainable livelihood, social and political representation.

Exclusion and deprivation is closely associated with the denial of property rights, civil rights, and lack of access to education. Over a period of time due to their physical and social segregation from the rest of the society, the extent of deprivation became more intense, and further entrenched through the institution of untouchability. It is this institutionalized exclusion of the low castes, from access to economic rights, civil rights and human development has caused severe poverty and deprivation.

In response to this discrimination, the Indian government has consistently developed policies for their economic, social and political empowerment. 'Positive interventions', 'affirmative actions', and accompanying policy processes were initiated for an encompassing empowerment of these social group over half a century ago. Though these policies have brought some positive change, the process of transformation has been extremely slow and inadequate to minimize the handicaps and disabilities.

In this background, this seminar proposes to address the issue of education, health, employment, poverty and livelihood inequality and exclusion of marginalized sections in the contemporary Indian society within the framework of exclusive development, and understand the role of sociology in dealing with marginalization issues and problems in holistic manner.
